

KIM PIFFY

CURRICULUM VITAE

Kim is a multidisciplinary visual artist with over 10 years of experience. Working primarily from home by necessity, she treats domestic and digital spaces as sites of research and production. Her practice often explores how artists navigate labour, care, identity, and emotional life, using visual language, mythic themes, and symbolic forms as tools for reflection and coping.

With a strong interest in creating slow, sensory-aware environments, Kim develops immersive work that prioritises atmosphere, pacing, and audience experience. Alongside exhibition-making, she facilitates workshops and collaborative projects with a range of participants, including young people and SEND groups.

Naturally proficient in the use of technology and digital tools, Kim continues to develop flexible working methods that support her artistic practice. She is committed to collaboration, ongoing learning, and creating work that is both visually engaging and grounded in lived experience.

WHY?

I am applying to the Home Based Future Curator Programme because the role reflects the realities of how I live and work as a neurodivergent artist and parent, and because its focus on disability justice, care, and access aligns closely with my practice.

I work from home by necessity rather than preference. My working life is shaped by care responsibilities, access needs, and the requirement for flexibility in pace, environment, and method. Rather than viewing home-based working as a limitation, my practice treats the home as a site of research and production: a place where questions of labour, care, intimacy, and visibility are continually negotiated.

I am drawn to the Future Curators Programme because it centres disabled and neurodivergent leadership, and because it actively challenges traditional curatorial models that prioritise speed, mobility, and physical presence over care and sustainability. DASH's commitment to disability justice and Wysing Arts Centre's interest in experimentation, rurality, and alternative working models feel like a meaningful context in which to deepen and articulate this work.

This role offers the opportunity to formalise and extend ways of working I have already developed independently, particularly around home-based practice, accessible immersive environments, and slow, relational engagement, while contributing to wider conversations about how curatorial practice can be reimagined through access, care, and lived experience.

HOW?

My background as an artist, organiser, and facilitator has given me extensive experience in developing and delivering projects that sit between artistic practice, curatorial thinking, and community engagement.

In my early career, I curated immersive and participatory exhibitions that were self-funded and independently produced, including Piffy at Centrespace Bristol (2022) and Pine at St Ann's Well, Malvern (2023). These early projects shaped what has become a community-driven practice, grounded in participation, atmosphere, and accessibility. More recently, my installation Imagining a Bright Future at Bridges of Light in Worcester (2025) explored collective experience through light, space, and reflection.

I have also developed work focused on disability visibility and inclusion, including contributions to What's the Difference? in partnership with Artlandish in Hereford (2025). As part of this project, I created wearable works referencing Tracey Emin's text-based t-shirts, to challenge assumptions about who an artist is and how disability is perceived within cultural spaces.

Alongside facilitating my own exhibitions, I have curated and organised group exhibitions and anti-fashion shows with disabled models and people from marginalised communities. I have also delivered workshops with SEND participants, young people, and community groups. This work requires careful attention to access, sensory environments, communication styles, and pace; skills that translate directly into inclusive curatorial practice.

My practice is shaped by collaboration and self-management. I regularly coordinate projects, manage budgets, schedules, and contributors, and adapt formats to meet participants' access needs. More recently, I studied coding to expand my capacity for digital and home-based work, supporting more flexible and sustainable freelance models.

My experience encompasses the core elements of curatorial practice: shaping contexts, working with artists and participants, developing frameworks for engagement, and holding space for reflection, dialogue, and care.

WHAT?

In this role, I am interested in exploring home-based curatorial practice as both a practical necessity and a conceptual framework. I am particularly interested in how domestic, digital, and dispersed spaces can function as legitimate curatorial sites — places where care, access, and artistic experimentation are not secondary concerns but central organising principles.

A key area of interest for me is the creation of immersive environments that are accessible under sensory considerations and that actively support regulation, rest, and reflection. I am interested in how sound, light, pacing, and spatial design, both physical and digital, can be curated in ways that alleviate rather than exacerbate experiences of overload, anxiety, or fatigue.

I am also keen to explore slow, relational forms of engagement: projects that prioritise ongoing connection over one-off events, and that allow artists and audiences to participate at their own pace. This includes experimenting with digital platforms as sites for storytelling, exchange, and international dialogue, without relying on travel or constant visibility.

Working with DASH and Wysing Arts Centre, I would like to develop curatorial approaches that acknowledge care responsibilities, neurodivergent working styles, and fluctuating capacity, while still producing rigorous and imaginative contemporary art contexts. I am interested in contributing to a model of curating that values sustainability, mutual support, and access as generative forces rather than constraints.
